Project overview

Bali is well known for its astonishing beauty and greenery. Unfortunately, due to rapid development and the rise in tourism, the local surroundings of Bali have experienced many negative consequences. Plastic water bottles and plastic food wrappers are of great concern and you will often see people simply throwing these on the ground, as food in Bali were traditionally wrapped in biodegradable banana leaves. The relationship between humans and the environment is an important part of the Balinese culture and the aim of this project is to instill environmental education in the children at a young age, imparting your message in a fun and dynamic manner. The emphasis is on “hands on” techniques – getting the children out and about in nature and working together. Participants spend two hours each morning planning their campaign and go to schools in Ubud area in the afternoon.

Our environmental education program focuses on primary schools in Bali. Whilst education is the starting point, we encourage students to work together and do their part, emphasizing that every little effort counts.

The relationship between humans and the environment is an intrinsic part of the Balinese culture and the Balinese are known to respect and treat their environment well long before it became fashionable in the West. One example of this is the Tumpek Uduh day which is a ceremony conducted across Bali for large trees especially fruit bearers and the coconut palm in particular. This is done in order to:

- Show gratitude to the trees for their usefulness to humans and the environment.
- Recognise their importance to the livelihood of the Balinese.
- Pray for continuance in the central role they play in providing a balance between both humans and their environment.

The teaching plan will be confirmed again every Friday.

Project itinerary

Our main students and helpers during your stay here in Indonesia will be the local children of the village you are assigned to. Because of this, it is important to be very understanding and able to adapt to the behaviour of children while still accomplishing your original goal. These children are not very skilled when it comes to cleaning modern garbage and it is up to you to teach them how to do it, both safely and properly.

As you work and teach, you will be educating children how to do the following (which will be taught to you beforehand if you do not have full knowledge yourself)

- Planting trees properly
- Cleaning up rivers that are filled with waste (plastics, debris)
- Cleaning beaches that may be heavily littered

On top of this, you will participate in a campaign that advocates safe and proper usage and disposal of non-biodegradable plastics. Your students will learn the different symbols that can be found on plastic and how to determine if the plastic will dissolve within a timely manner or if it needs to be disposed of in a proper manner. You will also describe the basic concept of recycling in order to prepare the locals for the potential of recycling centres in the future.

An understanding of Indonesian emphasis on environmentalism is important, so it is recommended that you brush up your knowledge on Tumpek Uduh day, which is a ceremony regularly conducted across Bali. The focus is on large trees which bear fruit, such as the coconut palm. Proper studying on this ceremony will enable you to identify and relate with the children you will be working with.
